THE VIGILANTE'S DROP: A SPECIAL REPORT

Advancements in biochemical engineering accelerate under Oscorp laboratory team.

CASE STUDY

Early this morning, a web-shooter cartridge was thrown through the precinct window. Attached was a note from the masked vigilante known as Spider-Man, claiming he arrived too late to save Vance from a winged assailant. The note read: "Look up. I hid a piece of the puzzle where the Vulture couldn't fly." Stuck to the precinct ceiling with thick webbing was Vance's old,

OR IS THE CRIME SCENE A PUZZLE WAITING TO BE SOLVED?

BY FLETCHER MORTON • SPECIAL CRIMINAL AFFAIRS CORRESPONDENT

At exactly midnight, Dr. Elias Vance, Oscorp's chief system architect, was found lifeless in his R&D lab. The experimental blueprints for 'Project Web-Fluid' are missing, and the facility's central mainframe has been thrown into an absolute lockdown, demanding a 12-letter passcode to prevent a total data wipe. Detectives found the lab completely trashed, save for a few deliberately placed items. The victim's hand was frozen in rigor mortis, his index finger pointing directly at a framed, vintage schematic of a high-performance combustion engine. Captain Yuri Watanabe suspects this was no accident; Vance was leaving a breadcrumb trail. "He was a master builder, a creator of complex pipelines who loved puzzles," Watanabe stated. "He knew his killer was looking for the code, so he broke it into pieces before he died."

HERO OR MENACE? CITIZENS DIVIDED

BY JORDAN KRAVITZ • GLOBE STAFF REPORTER

SPIDER-MAN — SIGHTED ADAPS: HERO OR MENACE?

Forensics teams using ultraviolet light discovered a desperate act by Dr. Vance hidden in the lab. Just inches from where his body was found, etched faintly into the titanium floorboards with a high-heat laser pen, was a single, solitary letter 'S'. Investigators initially believed it stood for his suspected attacker, Spider-Man. However, cryptanalysts now theorize it is simply the third sequential fragment of his master password, mathematically linking his mechanical and medical clues together.

THE MIDNIGHT DEADLINE

Oscorp shareholders are in a panic as the sun rises on September 15th. The locked mainframe terminal currently displays no keypad or traditional password prompt. Instead, the screen shows a glowing, 24-hour countdown timer superimposed over a bright, rising sun, emphasizing to the authorities that they have exactly one day to solve the sequence. For a man who dedicated his life to building the infrastructure of the future, colleagues say it is poetic that his final 12-letter riddle honors the very essence of his profession, cleverly scattered across the room on this specific date.
